Heather Brown, Manager

Dear Mr. Zucker, Mr. Bass, Ms. Levin, and Ms. Brown,

We write to you on behalf of the Coalition for Religious Literacy, a growing collection of Hindu and Indian American organizations, and organizations supportive of Hindu and Indian Americans, who are deeply disturbed and gravely concerned by the initial episode of Reza Aslan’s Believer, which premiered on CNN on Sunday, March 5. That episode, filmed in Varanasi, India — one of Hinduism’s holiest cities — featured Aslan interacting with a reclusive sect of Hindu ascetics, while offering inflammatory and stereotypical misrepresentations of Hinduism’s core teachings and practices. In the wake of growing anti-immigrant sentiment across the US -- last month’s hate crime shootings of two Indian Hindus in Kansas being the most widely reported -- we fear that Believer’s erroneous depictions, misleading imagery, and unnecessarily provocative scenes only serve to exacerbate Hinduphobia.

We the undersigned, hereby request that CNN engage in an urgent and constructive dialogue with the Hindu American community and take the following steps:

1. Provide a prominently visible space on CNN’s Belief Blog, and on the homepage of the Believer series, for a spiritually and academically informed rejoinder correcting misrepresentations of the Hindu tradition that the debut episode promoted.
2. Broadcast a focus group session on CNN discussing the strong emotions that the first Believer episode elicited in the United States among Hindu Americans. Among others, we ask a focus group feature key stakeholders from the community, including scholars of Hinduism, Hindu Americans holding public office, community advocates, and other practicing Hindus who can articulate the underlying concerns that triggered the current controversy.
3. We ask that CNN desist from any future broadcast of the first episode of Believer due to the manifold errors in presentation and inherent risks to the Hindu American community as outlined herein.
4. If and when, future broadcasts occur, the following disclaimer should be aired prior to broadcast: Aghoris are a small sect of Hindu ascetics who are deeply misunderstood and often misrepresented. Aghoris perform mystical and unorthodox rituals in an effort to transcend duality and achieve spiritual oneness. Many of their rituals and practices are not representative of the majority of Hinduism’s adherents. Lastly, caste-based discrimination violates Hindu teachings. This episode is not suitable for educational purposes.

Religious literacy in America is woefully low and even lower with respect to Hinduism. In fact, the Pew Religious Knowledge Survey of 2013 found that only 36% of Americans could correctly answer a single basic question about Hinduism. Combined with today’s highly charged climate, we fail to understand by CNN would choose to introduce its viewers to Hinduism, a faith practiced by more than one billion people worldwide, through the sensationalized, inaccurate, and provocative lens of Aslan’s Believer.

By now, we are certain that CNN is aware of the outrage engendered by the debut of Believer. Nearly all Hindu members of Congress, academics, and prominent members of the community are weighing in, expressing an outrage that mirrors the mood of a vast majority of three million Hindu and Indian Americans.

We anticipate a positive response from CNN, and look forward to a sustained dialog towards a rapid and mutually acceptable resolution to what is being perceived as a crisis in the Hindu American community. We anticipate your response by Friday, March 17th and can be reached at 202.223.8222.

Regards,

The Coalition for Religious Literacy
